Lose (lūz), sb.[2] slang. [f. LOSE v.[1]] An instance of losing (a race).

1884 Illustr. Lond. News Nov. 410/3 The rate of pay recognised by the Jockey Club, which is five guineas for a 'win', and three guineas for a 'lose'.

Lose (lūz), v.[1] Forms: 1 losian, 2-3 losie(n, 5 Sc. loyse, 5-6 losse, Sc. lois(s, 5, Sc. 6- loss, 5-8 loose, 6 Sc. los, loce, (loase, 7 loze), 3- lose. Pa. t. 1 losode, -ade, 1-3 -ede, 4 Sc. losit, 4-6 loste, Sc. lossit, -yt, 6 Sc. loissit, loussit, (7 loosed, losed), 3- lost. Pa. pple. 1 (ȝe)losod, -ad, 3 ilosed, -et, 3-5 ilost, 4 losed, 4-5 i-, ylost(e, 4-6 loste, (Sc. losit, -yt, 5-6 loissit, lossit, -yt, 6 loist, loseit, 7 loissed), 3- lost. [OE. losian, f. los Loss, used almost exclusively intr. (sense 1); sometimes with indirect obj. in dative, as me losode hit = I lost it. The transitive use, which occurs twice in ONorthumbrian and appears in general use early in 13th c., seems to have arisen partly from interchange of function between the indirect obj. and the subj. where these were not distinguishable by case-form (cf. LIKE v., LOATHE v.), and partly from the perfect conjugated with be (OE. hit is gelosod = it is lost), which admits of being apprehended as passive. The later sense-development of the vb. has been influenced by the cognate LEESE v., with which it became synonymous, and which it in the end superseded.

The regular mod. Eng. pronunciation repr. OE. losian would be (lōuz); the standard Eng. pronunciation (lūz) seems to be due to association with LOOSE v., which in some contexts (e.g. to loose hold) closely approaches this vb. in meaning. Many dialects have the phonetic fo m normally descending from the OE. vb. The Sc. form loss is prob. evolved from the pa. t. and pa. pple. lost.]

(rendering L. sors, portio):—OTeut. type hluto-m*, f. the wk. grade of the root hleut-* (: hlaut- : hlūt-) occurring in the str. vb. OE. hlēotan, OS. hliotan, OHG. liozan (MHG. lieʒen), ON. hlióta, to cast lots, obtain by lot. The precise formal equivalent of the Eng. word is not found elsewhere exc. perh. in OFris. hlot (? neut.), MDu. lot neut. (also masc.), Du. lot neut.; but synonymous sbs. from the same root appear in all the Teut. langs. From the wk. grade are, besides those already mentioned, OHG. (h)luʒ masc., ON. hlut-r, hlot-r masc. (MSw. luter, loter, Sw. lott, Da. lod), hlute wk. masc.; from the form hlaut-* are OE. hlȳt, hlēt, hlīet masc. (:—OTeut. hlauti-z*), Goth. hlaut-s masc. (rendering κλῆρος), OS. hlôt masc., OHG. (h)lôʒ masc. and neut. (MHG. lôʒ masc. and neut., mod.G. loos. los neut.); cf. also ON. hlaut fem., blood of sacrifice. The Teut. word was adopted into the Rom. langs.: F. lot (whence lotir to divide, in OF. to cast lots), It. lotto game of chance, Sp., Pg. lote lot, Sp. loto 'lot' put up to auction. Probably some of the uses of the Eng. word are due to the influence of F. lot.

The primary meaning of the Teut. root hleut-* is uncertain. Schrader has suggested that it may have been formed by secondary ablaut from the wk.-grade hlut-* (repr. pre-Teut. klḍ-: see HOLT) in the sb. hluto-m*, the primary sense of which would then be the piece of wood used in casting lots. But this conjecture is very doubtful, and not free from difficulties.]

1. An object (app. usually a piece of wood) used in a widely diffused ancient method of deciding disputes, dividing plunder or property, selecting persons for an office or duty, etc., by an appeal to chance or the divine agency supposed to be concerned in the results of chance. The 'lots', each bearing the special mark of one of the competitors, were placed in a receptacle (in Homeric Greece a helmet); according to Greek procedure the vessel was shaken, the winning lot being that which fell out first; in Scandinavia (see Vigf. s.v. hlutr) the winning lot was drawn out by an uninterested party. In Eng. (exc. in rare modern instances, chiefly translations from ancient langs.) the word in this sense occurs only in the phr. to cast, draw (†also lay, put, send, throw, warp) lots (or †lot); followed by on or upon, over, between, for (the object or objects concerned); also by inf. or indirect interrog. clause.

In genuine OE. idiom the vb. governing hlot was weorpan to throw (see WARP v.); cf. G. das loos werfen, L. sortes conicere, Gr. κλῆρον βαλλειν. In ME. werpe was superseded by the synonymous cast and throw. The OE. use of sendan is a Latinism, after mittere of the Vulgate. The only forms of the phrase that survive are to cast lots (arch.) and to draw lots (cf. F. tirer au sort), which is interpreted as synonymous with to draw cuts (CUT sb.[1] 1).

1864 F. OAKELEY Hist. Notes 60 The various gradations of Dissent and Low-Churchism.

Low Churchman. [Cf. HIGH CHURCHMAN.] A member of the Church of England holding opinions which give a low place to the authority and claims of the episcopate and priesthood, to the inherent grace of the sacraments, and to matters of ecclesiastical organization, and thus differ relatively little from the opinions held by Protestant Nonconformists.

The term, invented as an antithesis to High Churchman, was in the early part of the 18th c. used as equivalent to LATITUDINARIAN. Afterwards it fell into disuse, but was revived in the 19th c., when the designation High Churchman had obtained a new currency as applied to those who inclined to the theology and ritual of pre-Reformation times. In this later use, Low Churchman has for the most part been viewed as equivalent to EVANGELICAL, and has rarely been applied to members of the Broad Church School.

1702 Charac. Church-Man 18 He is for shewing the Low Church Men in their own proper Colours. 1703 DE FOE *Short. The spelling lewxerne (quot. 1662), if not a misprint, is conclusive evidence in favour of this derivation. L. lupus cervārius (Pliny) lynx, lit. 'stag-hunting wolf' (lupus wolf, cervārius adj. f. cervus stag). 2. The rebel archangel whose fall from heaven was supposed to be referred to in Isa. xiv. 12; Satan, the Devil. Now rare in serious use; current chiefly in the phrase As proud as Lucifer.

The Scripture passage (Vulg. 'Quomodo cecidisti de cælo, Lucifer, qui mane oriebaris?' A.V. 'How art thou fallen from heauen, O Lucifer, sonne of the morning?') is part of a 'parable against the king of Babylon' (Isa. xiv. 4); but the mention of a fall from heaven led Christian interpreters to suppose that 'king of Babylon' was to be interpreted spiritually, as a designation of the chief of 'the angels who kept not their first estate'. Hence the general patristic view that Lucifer was the name of Satan before his fall. The Latin word was adopted in all the Eng. versions down to 1611; the Revised version has daystar.

Luck (lŭk), sb. Also 5–6 luk(e, 6–7 lucke. [a. LG. (Du., OFris.) luk, a shortened form of geluk (MDu. gelucke = MHG. gelücke, mod.G. glück). Parallel adoptions of the LG. word are Icel. lukka (14th c.), MSw. lukka, lykka (mod.Sw. lycka), Da. lykke. Probably it came into English as a gambling term; the LG. dialects were a frequent source of such terms in 15–16 centuries.

The ultimate etymology of MHG. gelücke (:—OHG. gilucchi* :—OTeut. type galukkjo-m*) is obscure. So far as meaning is concerned nothing could be more plausible than Paul's view (Beitr. VII. 133 note) that the word is connected with G. gelingen (OHG. gilingan) to succeed, turn out well or ill, as G. druck pressure with dringen to press, schluck gulp with schlingen to swallow, ruck wrench with ringen to wrench. But morphologically this assumption seems quite inadmissible, and most scholars deny the existence of etymological affinity in any of these instances. Formally, the word might be cognate with Louk v.[1] or v.[2], or with G. locken to entice (OHG. lockôn) and the synonymous OHG. lucchen; but no probable hypothesis seems to have been formed to connect the meaning of the sb. with that of any of these vbs.]

Senses 2–4 are common to various mod. langs.: F. lof, Sp., Pg. ló, Du. loef (whence LG. loff, G. luv, Da. luv, Sw. luf). The manner of their development is obscure, and it is uncertain whether they originated in Fr., Eng., or (? most prob.) Du. Sense 5 is peculiar to Eng., and it is not easy to connect it with any of the other senses.

Certain other meanings which the word has had in Du. and Fr. need to be accounted for before any hypothesis as to the primitive meaning and sense-development can be regarded as satisfactory. In early mod.Du. loef, looue is explained as 'thole-pin' (scalmus, Kilian). In the 17th c. the F. lof or loo is stated to mean 'the distance from the mast to the place on the side to which the sheet is fastened when the vessel is close-hauled'. (See the quot. from Nicot in Godef., s.v.) In the existing uncertainty as to the primary meaning, the ultimate etymology remains obscure; the current view that it represents a Teut. word cogn. with ON. lófe palm, LOOF sb.[1], depends on the doubtful assumption that the 'lof' of sense 1 was a steering paddle.]

As a synonym of ear, it first appears early in the 16th c., and in colloquial Sc. use has entirely superseded the older word. Presumably this application is a transferred use of a word that existed earlier with some other meaning. It is possible that the sense 'ear-flap of a cap', which is the earliest represented in our quots., may really be prior to the sense 'ear'; for similar transferences of words from parts of clothing to the parts of the body covered, cf. breech, crown, sole. If so, the word may perh. be of Scandinavian origin, with a general sense of 'something that can be pulled or laid hold of', specialized differently in Sw. lugg forelock, with which cf. Eng. dial. (Sheffield, North Derb., etc.) 'to pull (somebody's) lugs', meaning not as in Scotland, the ears, but the hair. (See LUG v.)] same meaning (in Auvergne, a churchwarden). See Du Cange s.vv. Luminator, Luminaria.] In St. Andrews University, a student (one in each class) who was privileged to attend the professor's lectures without payment, and to receive certain dues from the other students, in return for services rendered by him.

The Librarian of the University, Mr. J. Maitland Anderson, informs us that the first student whom he has found described in the records as 'luminator' entered the University in 1697; it is, however, probable that the title goes back to mediæval times. It is supposed that the 'luminator' originally provided lights and fires to the classes; but there is no contemporary evidence of this. Between 1800 and 1827 his duties seem to have been those of a clerk (cf. quot. a 1808). The office was abolished about 1830.

It is commonly stated that the University seal contains a representation of a 'luminator' holding a candle while a professor is lecturing. But whether the object is a candle or something else (? a mace), and whether the figure holding it is meant for the 'luminator', seems to be quite uncertain.

Luncheon, commonly believed to be a derivative of lunch, occurs in our quots. 11 years earlier, with its present spelling. Luncheon (lʌnˈshən). Also 7 lunchen, lunch-

ion, lunching, 7–8 lunchin, 8 lunshin. [Related in some way to LUNCH *sb.*2

The ordinary view, that the spelling lunching represents the etymological form, appears somewhat unlikely. In our quots. the earliest form is luncheon, and this appears in our quots. earlier than lunch; and there is no evidence of a derivative verb in the 16–17th c. It is possible that luncheon might have been extended from lunch on the analogy of the relation between punch, puncheon, trunch, truncheon.]

Obviously related in some way to this Fr. word are early and dial. mod.G. lortsch, lurtsch, lorz, lurz, the name of a game, also as adj. in lurz werden, a phrase in various games, expressing the failure to achieve some object aimed at; MHG. lorz, lurz (also lerz), mod. The most plausible supposition with regard to the relation between these words is that the MHG. lurz left, wrong, or its derivative lurtsch (cf. linksch from link), was adopted into Fr. as a gaming term (lourche adj.), and that lourche sb. as the name of a game was developed from the adj. Lurch (lɜːtʃ), sb.[3] [Of obscure origin.

The word app. occurs as the second element of lee-larches in the first quot. below, for which later nautical and other dicts. substitute lee-lurches. If lee-larches in Falconer be not a misprint for -lurches, it may represent an altered pronunciation of the older lee-latch, in the word of command 'have a care of the lee-latch', i. e. 'look that the ship does not go to leeward of her course' (Milit. & Sea Dict. 1711). It seems possible that lurch originated in the compound lee-lurch, an alteration (by association with LURCH sb.[1] 3) of lee-larch for lee-latch, which prob. contains LATCH sb.[2], LETCH sb.[2] inclination (for the sense development cf. the etymological note on LIST sb.[3]).]

The literary currency of this sense (which seems still to exist in s. w. dialects) is due to the recollection of the instance in Shaks. (quot. 1610). Lushington (lʌ·ʃiŋtən). slang. [Punning use of the surname Lushington, with allusion to LUSH *sb.*2

The 'City of Lushington' was the name of a convivial society (consisting chiefly of actors) which met at the Harp Tavern, Russell Street, until about 1895. It had a 'Lord Mayor' and four 'aldermen', presiding over 'wards' called Juniper, Poverty, Lunacy, and Suicide. On the admission of a new member, the 'Lord Mayor' (of late years at least) harangued him on the evils of excess in drink. The 'City' claimed to have existed for 150 years; if this claim be well-founded, the existence of LUSH *sb.*2 will be authenticated for a date considerably earlier than that of our first quot. Our information is from 'Sir' B. Davies, the last 'Lord Mayor of Lushington'.]

-ly, suffix[1] (Forms: 1 -lic, -lic, 2–5 -lich, 4-5 -liche, 3–5 north. -lik(e, (3 Orm. -lic, -liȝ, -like), 3–6 -li, 4– -ly), appended to sbs. and adjs. to form adjs., represents the OE. -līc, corresponding to OFris., OS. -līk (Du. -lijk), OHG. -līh (MHG. -lich, mod.G. -lich), ON. -lig-r, -leg-r (Sw., Da. -lig), Goth. -leik-s:—OTeut. -līko-. The phonology of the OE. form, as also of the mod.G. and the ON. forms, is somewhat abnormal, the frequency in use of the suffix having caused loss of the original secondary stress, with consequent shortening of the vowel, and in ON. also voicing of the guttural. A further irregularity appears in the phonetic development in ME. The normal representation of OE. -līc was -līk in northern dialects and -lich in southern dialects. These forms are found as late as the 15th century; but the form -li, -ly, which (though parallel with the reduction of OE. ic to I, and of ME. everich to every) seems to be chiefly due to the influence of the Scandinavian -lig-, occurs in northern and midland dialects as early as the 13th c., and before the end of the 15th c. had become universal. In the Ormulum (c 1200) -līc (rarely -like) is used before a vowel and at the end of a line, and -līȝ before a cons.; the inflected form -like (disyllabic) seems often to be used, for metrical reasons, where grammar would require the uninflected form. In the comparative and superlative (OE. -līcra, -ĕ, -licost) the ME. form had regularly -k according to phonetic law in all dialects (in the south the usual 13–14th c. form was -lukere, -lokest); but where the positive had the form -li new comparatives and superlatives in -lier, liest were regularly formed from it.

The original Teut. adjs. in -līko- were compounds of the sb. līkom* appearance, form, body (see LICH). Thus mannlīko-* ('manly') means etymologically 'having the appearance or form of a man'; gōdlīko- ('goodly') 'having a good appearance or form', or 'having the appearance or form of what is good'. The primitive force of the suffix may therefore be rendered by 'having the appearance or form indicated by the first element of the word'; but while in the historical Teut. langs. it has remained capable of expressing this meaning, it has in all of them acquired a much wider application.

When appended to sbs., the most general senses of the suffix in all Teut. langs. are 'having the qualities appropriate to', 'characteristic of', 'befitting'. In English of all periods it has been a prolific formative; the adjs. formed with it are most frequently eulogistic, as in kingly, knightly, masterly, princely, queenly, scholarly, soldierly (cf. manly, womanly with mannish, womanish); among the examples with dyslogistic sense are beastly, beggarly, cowardly, dastardly, rascally, ruffianly, scoundrelly. In OE., as in other Teut. langs., the suffix had often the sense 'of or pertaining to'; but the adjs. have, so far as this meaning is concerned, been to a great extent superseded by synonyms of Latin or Romanic etymology. Thus manly formerly admitted of the senses now expressed by human and masculine; for one of the older senses of timely we must now say temporal. Another use of the suffix, common to English with other Teut. langs., is to form adjs. denoting periodic recurrence, as daily, hourly, monthly, nightly, weekly, yearly.

When -ly is appended to an adj., the resulting derivative adj. often connotes a quality related to or resembling that expressed by its primary; cf., e.g., OE. léof 'dear' with léoflic 'lovely' (or, as it might be rendered, 'such as becomes dear'). The diminutive sense found in mod.G. gelblich yellowish, süsslich sweetish, though a very easy development from the original sense of the suffix, does not seem ever to have existed in English. Even in OE. -lic had app. ceased to be used in new formations from adjs.; the new adjs. f. adj. + -ly that have arisen in ME. or in mod.E. seem to be from the advs.

-ly, suffix [2] (Forms: 1–2 -līce, 2–5 -liche, 4–5 -lich, 3–5 north. -like, (3 Orm. -like, -liȝ), 3–6 -li, 4– -ly), forming adverbs, represents OE. -līce, corresponding (functionally if not morphologically) to OFris. -līke, OS. -līko (M.Du. -līke, Du. -lijk, MLG. -līke, mod.LG. -lik), OHG. -līchô (MHG. -līche, mod.G. -lich), ON. -liga, -lega (MSw. -lika, -leka, in mod.Sw. superseded by -ligt, -ligen; Da. -lig), Goth. -leikô, derived from -līko- (see -LY [1]) with an adverb-forming suffix, OTeut. -ô, according to some repr. the ending of the abl. fem. (pre-Teut. -āđ) or neut. (pre-Teut. -ōđ); according to others that of the instrumental neut. (pre-Teut. -ōm).

The form-history of the suffix in Eng. is similar to that of -LY [1]: in ME. the OE. -līce was normally represented by -līche (southern), -like (northern), the compar. being -līker, -liker, -loker (superl. -est).

The form -li, -ly, which was current in East Midland English in the 14th c., and became general in the 15th c., is probably due to the influence of the ON. -liga. In the strongly Scandinavianized dialect of the Ormulum (c 1200) -liz and -like are used indifferently, according to the requirements of the metre. Where the positive ended in -li, -ly, the comparative and superlative ended in -lier, -liest. In the 15–17th c. forms like falslyer, traitorouslyer (Malory), softlier, justlier, widelier (Long Barclay's Argenis 1625), easilier, -est (R. Baxter Saving Faith 1658) were common, but in later use the advs. in -ly are compared with more, most, the inflexional forms being only employed in poetry or for rhetorical effect.

In OTeut. an adv. with this suffix must have implied the existence of an adj. with the suffix corresponding to -LY [1]. In OE., however, there are several instances (e.g. bealdlīce boldly, swētlīce sweetly) in which an adv. in -līce has been formed directly from a simple adj. without the intervention of an adj. in -līc. In ME. the number of these direct formations was greatly increased, and when the final -e, which was the original OE. adverb-making suffix, ceased to be pronounced, it became usual to append -ly to an adj. as the regular mode of forming an adv. of manner. It was, down to the 17th c., somewhat frequently attached, with this function, even to adjs. in -ly, as earlily, godlily, kindlily, livelily, lovelily, statelily; but these formations are now generally avoided as awkward, while on the other hand it is felt to be ungraceful to use words like godly, goodly, lovely, mannerly, timely, as advs.; the difficulty is usually evaded by recourse to some periphrastic form of expression. In examples belonging to the 16th and 17th c. it is sometimes difficult to determine whether a writer intended the adv. goodly to mean 'in a good manner' or 'in a goodly manner', and there are other instances of similar ambiguity. In the words denoting periodical recurrence, as daily, hourly, the adj. and the adv. are now identical in form. A solitary example of an adv. f. sb. + -ly [2] with no related adj. is partly. From the early part of the 16th c. the suffix has been added to ordinal numerals to form advs. denoting serial position, as firstly, secondly, thirdly, etc. (cf. F. premièrement, etc.).

When -ly is attached to a disyllabic or polysyllabic adj. in -le, the word is contracted, as in ably, doubly, singly, simply; contractions of this kind occur already in the 14th c., but examples of the uncontracted forms (e. g. doubtlely) are found as late as the 17th c. Whole + -ly becomes wholly, but in all other similar instances the written e is retained before the suffix, e. g. in palely, vilely, puerilely. Adjs. ending graphically with ll lose one l before -ly, as in fully (in southern Eng. commonly pronounced with a single l, but in Scotland often with double or long l), dully (dʌ·l¦li), coolly (kū·l¦li). Adjs. of more than one syll. ending in y change y to i before -ly, as in merrily; in formations from monosyllabic adjs. the usage varies, e. g. dryly, drily; gayly, gaily (cf. daily, which is the only current form); slyly, slily (but always shyly); greyly, grayly has always y. Another orthographical point is the dropping of the e in the two words duly, truly. It is unusual to append -ly to an adj. in -ic; the ending of the adv. is nearly always -ICALLY, even when the only current form of the adj. ends in -ic.

Lynch law. Orig. U.S. In early use Lynch's (Linch's) law. The practice of inflicting summary punishment upon an offender, by a self-constituted court armed with no legal authority; it is now limited to the summary execution of one charged with some flagrant offence.

Now most commonly written lynch-law or lynch law, though the capital L is still often used.

The origin of the expression has not been determined. It is often asserted to have arisen from the proceedings of Charles Lynch, a justice of the peace in Virginia, who in 1782 was indemnified by an act of the Virginia Assembly for having illegally fined and imprisoned certain Tories in 1780. But Mr. Albert Matthews informs us that no evidence has been adduced to show that Charles Lynch was ever concerned in acts such as those which from 1817 onward were designated as 'Lynch's law'. It is possible that the perpetrators of these acts may have claimed that in the infliction of punishments not sanctioned by the laws of the country they were following the example of Lynch, which had been justified by the act of indemnity; or there may have been some other man of this name who was a ringleader in such proceedings. Some have conjectured that the term is derived from the name of Lynche's Creek, in South Carolina, which is known to have been in 1768 a meeting-place of the 'Regulators', a band of men whose professed object was to supply the want of regular administration of criminal justice in the Carolinas, and who committed many acts of violence on those suspected of 'Toryism'.

1817 S. ROANE in W. Wirt Life P. Henry (1818) 372 In the year 1792, there were many suits on the south side of the James river, for inflicting Lynch's law. 1819 W. FAUX Diary 29 Nov. in Memor. Days in Amer. (1823) 304 The people [of Princeton, Indiana] .. deputed four persons to inform him, that unless he quitted the town and state immediately, he should receive Lynch's law, that is, a whipping in the woods. 1828 J. HALL Lett. fr. West 291 No commentator has taken any notice of Linch's Law, which was once the lex loci of the frontiers. 1835 W. IRVING Tour Prairies 41 'Lynch's law', as it is technically termed, in which the plaintiff is apt to be witness, jury, judge, and executioner. 1839 STONEHOUSE Axholme 112 The burning Reading's house was..a terrible example of what the Americans term lynch law. 1879 FARRAR St. Paul I. 570 They seized the opportunity of executing a little Lynch law. 1888 BRYCE Amer. Commw. III. 309 Lynch law, however shocking it may seem to Europeans, is far removed from arbitrary violence.

So Lynch-court nonce-wd., a self-constituted tribunal for exercising lynch law. Judge Lynch, the imaginary authority from whom the sentences of lynch law are jocularly said to proceed.

1849 LYELL 2nd Visit to U.S. II. 32 My companions..said ..'If you were a settler there [in Florida], and had no other law to defend you, you would be glad of the protection of Judge Lynch'. 1890 CORBETT Drake v. 73 Few prisoners fared so well at Westminster .. as did Thomas Doughty at that first Lynch-court amidst the desolation of Patagonia.

M.

M (em), the thirteenth letter of the modern and twelfth of the ancient Roman alphabet, represents historically the Greek mū and the Semitic mēm. The Phœnician form of the letter is 𐤌, whence the early Gr. and L. 𐌌, ⋔, M. Its phonetic value has varied little; in Eng. it has always expressed what was doubtless its original sound, that of the bilabial nasal consonant, which is normally voiced, though when it is followed by an unvoiced consonant it has an unvoiced ending. Like the other nasals, m is capable of being used as a sonant or vowel, denoted by ('m) in the phonetic notation here employed; but in Eng. this occurs only after ð and z at the end of words (of Gr. etymology), as rhythm, spasm, schism, and the suffix -ism; in these words many speakers substitute (-əm). The letter is never silent, exc. initially before n in Gr. derivatives, as mnemonic.

Macadamize (măkæ·dăməiz), v. Also M'Adamise, -ize. [f. MACADAM + -IZE.]

1. trans. To make or repair (a road) according to J. L. McAdam's system, which consists in laying down successive layers of stone broken into pieces of nearly uniform size, each layer being allowed to consolidate under the pressure of ordinary wheel traffic before the next is laid upon it.

See McAdam's pamphlet, Remarks on the Present System of Road-Making (ed. 5, 1822). He did not approve of the placing of any kind of foundation under the layers of stone, of the use of sand or gravel as 'binding' material, or of the smoothing of the surface by heavy rollers; though the name of 'macadamizing' is now often given to methods in which some or all of these practices are admitted.

Macrocosm (mæ·krǫkǫz'm). Also rarely in L. and quasi-Gr. forms: 7 macrocosmus, 9 -cosmos. [ad. F. macrocosme (c 1300), ad. med.L. macrocosmus, repr. Gr. *μακρὸς κόσμος (μακρός long, great, κόσμος world). (Cf. MEGACOSM.)

Although med.L. macrocosmus has not been found earlier than in Higden (c 1350) it must be the source of the Fr. form recorded c 1300, and it seems to imply the prior existence of a Gr. phrase *μακρὸς κόσμος formed in imitation of μικρὸς κόσμος MICROCOSM. For the idea expressed, cf. Macrobius in Somn. Scip. I. xii, 'Ideo physici mundum magnum hominem, et hominem brevem mundum esse dixerunt'. From the use of brevem here, and the gloss 'Microcosmum..petit monde, c'est l'homme qui peu dure' (Du Cange), it may be suspected that μακρός was at first intended in the sense of 'long', interpreted with regard to duration; though the inference is not absolutely necessary, as the formal similarity of the word to μικρός would sufficiently account for its selection in an antithetic phrase. However this may be, the relation of the words macrocosm and microcosm has suggested the use of Macro- with the and microcosm as suggested the use of Macro- with the sense 'on a large scale', in many modern words antithetic to words beginning with micro-.]

1. The 'great world' or universe, in contradistinction to the 'little world' or MICROCOSM, i. e. to man viewed as an epitome of the universe.

The earliest instances of the word in Eng. occur in Lydgate's Assembly of the Gods (c 1420; oldest MS. a 1500), where however it is a mistake (either on the part of Lydgate or of the scribe) for microcosm. (See, e.g., line 1828: And as for Macrocosme, hit ys no more to say But the lesse worlde.)

1600 W. Watson Decacordon (1602) 274 Throughout all this vaste Macrocosme, they finde not one patterne..like to ours. 1794 G. Adams Nat. & Exp. Philos. IV. xlix. 353 Applied and determined by an Infinite Mind in the macrocosm or universe. 1867 Froude Short Stud., Sci. Hist. 9 He desires, first, to see the spirit of the Macrocosmos. 1881 Huxley in Nature No. 615. 346 The microcosm repeats the macrocosm.

2. transf. In various occasional applications, denoting some great whole, the structure of which is conceived to be imaged on a smaller scale by that of some constituent portion of it.

1851 Sir F. Palgrave Norm. & Eng. I. 347 No population ..is absolutely inert in the macrocosm of humanity. 1875 N. Amer. Rev. CXX. 256 The macrocosm of society can be inferred from the microcosm of individual human nature. 1896 J. R. Harris Union with God iii. 59 His life is the great life, and all our little lives are involved in it, Christ being the macrocosm, and ourselves the microcosm.

Hence Ma·croco·smic a. [-IC], of or pertaining to the macrocosm or universe. † Macroco·smical a. [-IC + -AL], = prec. Macrocosmo·logy [-(O)LOGY], a description of the macrocosm.

Cult.* I. 316 It forms part of that macrocosmic description of the universe well known in Asiatic myth.

Macute (mäkiū·t). Also 8 maccuta, maccute, macoute, 8-9 macuta. [ad. native African macuta.] At the beginning of the 18th c., said to be the name for one of the pieces of cloth used as money by the negroes of the Congo. Subsequently used in the W. African trade as the name for a money of account (= 2000 cowries), and hence adopted by the Portuguese at Angola as a denomination in their local coinage (= 50 reis); the Sierra Leone Company also issued (1791–1805) pieces of 1, 2, 5 and 10 macutes, the silver macute being worth about $4\frac{3}{4}d.$ sterling. Madam (mædəm), sb. Forms: 3–6 madame, 4–5 madaum Sc. madem(e, 5 maydame, 6 maddame, 4–9 madame, 4– madam. [a. OF. ma dame (in mod.Fr. written Madame), literally, 'my lady' (see Dame, Dam), corresp. etymologically to It. madonna, monna, med.L. mea domina.

The spelling madame is still preferred by some writers, but the more general and convenient practice is to write madam when the word is used as English, and Madame when it is used as a foreign title. For the plural (in sense 1) Mesdames is now used; the Eng. plural is obs. exc. in sense 3.]

1. A form of respectful or polite address (substituted for the name) originally used by servants in speaking to their mistress, and by people generally in speaking to a lady of high rank; subsequently used with progressively extended application, and now capable of being (in certain circumstances) employed in addressing a woman of whatever rank or position. (Corresponding to Sir.)

The early occurrence of Dame in the sense of mother suggests that in AF. and early ME. ma dame was very commonly used by children to their mother; but in the extant examples the mother so addressed is a queen or a lady of very high rank. In Chaucer's time (C. T. Prol. 376) to be addressed as madame was one of the advantages which a citizen's wife gained by her husband's being made alderman; this probably indicates the lowest social grade in which at that time the title could be claimed as a matter of customary right. In poetry of the 14th and 15th c. the lover often addresses his mistress as madame. Nuns (originally only the elder ones: see quot. c 1400) were called madame down to the Reformation.

While in France the title has (with certain customary exceptions) been confined to married women, in England no such rule has been generally adopted, though there are traces of a tendency in the 16–17th c. to address matrons as 'madam' and spinsters as 'mistress'.

From the 17th c. madam has been the title normally used in beginning or subscribing a letter to a woman of any station, except where the use of the name (as in 'Dear Mrs. A.' etc.) is permitted ('my lady', etc. not being admitted in epistolary usage). In oral use the title now rarely occurs; from the 18th c. it has been, except in very formal use, largely superseded by the contracted form Ma'am, which has itself in recent years been greatly restricted in currency; however, madam is in London and other towns still the word commonly used by salesmen to their female customers, and by persons in the position of servants to the public.

1. The title prefixed to the surname of a French married woman (corresponding to the Eng. 'Mrs.', 'Lady', etc., according to degree of rank). Abbreviated Mme.; in Eng. books and newspapers Mdme. often occurs.

In English use it is very commonly applied to a married woman belonging to any foreign nation (substituted, e.g., for the Ger. Frau or the Du. Mevrouw). It is also frequently assumed (instead of 'Mrs.') by English or American professional singers or musicians, and by women engaged in businesses such as dressmaking, in which native taste or skill is reputed to be inferior to that of Frenchwomen.

Madrepore (mæ·drĭpo·ɹ). [ad. mod.L. madrepora or F. madrépore (1710), ad. It. madrepora.

The Italian naturalist Ferrante Imperato (Hist. Nat., 1599) uses poro as a name for 'a kind of vegetable the substance of which resembles that of coral, but differs in being porous'. He evidently regarded this word as identical with the ordinary It. poro, ad. L. porus PORE sb.; but perh. it really represented late L. pōrus, a. Gr. πῶρος calcareous stone, stalactite. Among the species of 'poro' he enumerates millepora, frondipora, and 'those plants by some called madrepores (here madrípore, but elsewhere madrepora occurs), which are tubular growths, issuing from a common stem, and attached together at their roots, so that they resemble a honeycomb'. The word madrepora (which Imperato app. did not invent) seems to be f. madre mother + poro, the ending of the latter being changed to suit the gender of the sb. prefixed in apposition; on this view, the other words, millepora, frondipora, etc., must have been formed later in imitation of madrepora. A comparison of Imperato's woodcut of the 'madrepores' with those of the other species of poro seems to suggest that the prefix 'mother' may refer to the appearance of prolific growth characteristic of this 'plant'.]

Maelstrom (mē·lstrŏm). Also 7 [male-strand,] male stream, 8 malestrom, 9 maelström, and in Ger. form mahlstrom. [a. early mod.Du. maelstrom (now maalstroom), whirlpool, f. malen to grind, also to whirl round + stroom stream.

The use of maelstrom as a proper name (also in Fr.) seems to come from Du. maps, e.g. that in Mercator's Atlas (1595). Dutch philologists are of opinion that the word is native. It is true that it is found in all the mod. Scandinavian langs. as a common noun, but it is purely literary, and Danish scholars regard it as adopted from Du. or LG. The earliest known instance of Da. malstrøm (formerly also written malestrøm) occurs in 1673 in Debes Færoa reserata, the author of which was a pastor in the Færöe Islands. Cf. Norw. dial. malstraum (admitted by Aasen to be 'little used', which prob. means that he had never heard it in actual popular use), Sw. malström, Færoic malsn(str)ymur (Hammershaimb Færøsk Anthologi, Glossary; the vb. mala in Færoic means 'to grind', 'to whirl round').

The 15th c. form maked (only once, in a glossary) may be a metathetic alteration of maðek, madek; but even if so, it may be only an individual blunder, and in any case it seems unlikely to be the source of the mod. form; more probably it represents an occasional pronunciation of maggot (cf. mod. Somerset macket for MAGGOT[2]). Possibly the form mak, MAWK (a variant of MADDOCK) may have suggested a jocular application of the female nickname Maggot for Margaret (cf. MAGGOT[2] and the north midland dial. dick for a louse).]

1. The pretended art of influencing the course of events, and of producing marvellous physical phenomena, by processes supposed to owe their efficacy to their power of compelling the intervention of spiritual beings, or of bringing into operation some occult controlling principle of nature; sorcery, witchcraft. Also, the practice of this art.

The 'magic' which made use of the invocation of evil or doubtful spirits was of course always regarded as sinful; but natural magic, i. e. that which did not involve recourse to the agency of personal spirits, was in the Middle Ages usually recognized as a legitimate department of study and practice, so long as it was not employed for maleficent ends. Of 'natural magic' as understood by mediæval writers, typical examples are the making of an image, under certain astrological conditions, in order to injure or benefit the health of the person represented; and the application of a medicament to a weapon in order to heal the wound made by it. These things, if now practised, would still be called 'magic', though the qualification 'natural' would seem quite inappropriate. On the other hand, the 'natural magic' of the Middle Ages included much that from the standpoint of modern science is 'natural', but not 'magical', the processes resorted to being really, according to the now known laws of physical causation, adapted to produce the intended effects.

Magnanimity (mæ:gnăni·mĭti). [a. F. magnanimité, ad. L. magnanimitāt-em, f. magnanimus MAGNANIMOUS.]

† 1. Used (with somewhat vague meaning) as the name of one of the virtues recognized in mediæval ethics. Obs.

Primarily this represented the Aristotelian μεγαλοψυχία (see 3), but in scholastic descriptions the notion was modified in accordance with Christian ideals, and blended with elements suggested by the etymology of the L. word (animus being capable of the sense 'courage'); hence 'magnanimity' is often classed as a subdivision of 'fortitude' (so Aquinas, following Macrobius In Somn. Scip. I. viii. § 7).

† 2. Lofty courage; fortitude. Obs.

3. In the Aristotelian sense of μεγαλοψυχία (see below). Also, loftiness of thought or purpose; grandeur of designs, nobly ambitious spirit. Now rare.

In Aristotle the word (by modern translators rendered 'greatsouledness', 'highmindedness') expresses the attitude of one who, rightly conscious of his own great merits, is indifferent to praise except from those whose approval is valuable, regards the chances of fortune with equanimity, and, while ready to confer benefits, will seldom condescend to accept them.

It is not clear which of these two senses gave rise to the alchemical use; the brilliant lustre ascribed by the alchemists to 'magnesia' favours the latter view, and the substance seems not to have been identified with the loadstone, in spite of the resemblance of its name to the familiar word Magnes.]

[This use prob. arose from the notion that manganese was a form of the 'magnesia' of alchemy. There may, however, have been some early confusion of manganese with loadstone: Pliny N. H. xxxvi. lxvi says that loadstone (magnes lapis) was used in making glass. In the Latin of early chemistry the word was applied to various other substances: e.g. magnesia opalina was a red sulphide of antimony (? = KERMES 3).]

3. (In early use often †white magnesia = mod.L. magnesia alba, in contradistinction to black magnesia: see 2.) a. Originally, and still in popular language, applied to hydrated magnesium carbonate, a white earthy powder, used in medicine as an antacid and cathartic. Calcined magnesia: magnesium oxide (pure 'magnesia': see b) prepared by heating the carbonate. b. In modern Chemistry, an alkaline earth, now recognized as the oxide of magnesium (MgO).

[This application of the word seems not to be connected with the use in sense 1, but to have been suggested by the mod.L. magnes carneus 'flesh-magnet', applied c 1550 by Cardan (De Subtilitate VII, Opera III. 475) to a white earth resembling osteocolla, because it was found to adhere strongly to the lips, and was therefore supposed to have the same attraction for flesh that the loadstone has for iron. 2. A piece of loadstone; also, a piece of iron or steel to which the characteristic properties of loadstone have been imparted, either permanently or temporarily, by contact with another magnet, by induction, or by means of an electric current. A magnet has an axis, at the extremities of which (the 'poles') the attractive power is greatest, and at the middle of which it becomes nil. When suspended freely, a magnet assumes such a position that one of its poles (hence called the north pole) points approximately north, and the other (the south pole) approximately south; the like poles of two magnets repel each other, while the unlike poles attract each other.

Magneto (mægnī·tō), sb. Used colloq. as an abbreviation for magneto-electric machine.

1848 FARADAY in Phil. Trans. CXXXIX. 30 In that case the word magnetocrystallic ought probably to be applied to this force, as it is generated or developed under the influence of the magnet. Ibid. 40 Both the magnetic and magneto-crystallic forces are at the same time doubled or quadrupled.

Magne·to-ele·ctric, a. Pertaining to electric phenomena involving electric currents induced in conductors by the relative motion of these conductors with respect to either permanent magnets or electro-magnets.

Introduced, in 1831, by Faraday, who employed it in its most general sense for describing the currents induced by motion of conduction in conjunction with any of the following kinds of magnet: permanent steel magnets, ordinary loadstones, electro-magnets, the earth. He used it tentatively at first in contradistinction to the term volta-electric, which he applied to the induction of electricity by turning on or turning off an electric current in a stationary coil.

1831 FARADAY in Phil. Trans. (1832) CXXII. 139 As a distinction in language is still necessary, I propose to call the agency thus exerted by ordinary magnets, magneto-electric or magnelectric induction. Ibid. 173 Upon the supposition that the rotation of the earth tended, by magneto-electric induction, to cause currents in its own mass. 1833 Ibid. CXXIII. 44, I had the pleasure..of making an experiment, for which the great magnet [a loadstone] in the museum ..and the magneto-electric coil described in my first paper, were put in requisition. 1834 — in Philos. Mag. V. 349 When I first obtained the magneto-electric spark it was by the use of a secondary magnet. .. My principal was an electromagnet; Nobili's was, I believe, an ordinary magnet; others have used the natural magnet. 1839 J. F. DANIELL Introd. Chem. Philos. 489 Magneto-electric is the converse to electro-magnetic action. 1854 G. BIRD & C. BROOKE Elem. Nat. Philos. xvii. (ed. 4) 421 note, Similarly, electro-magnetic induction would mean the development of magnetism by a current, and magneto-electric induction, that of a current by magnetism. 1881 MAXWELL Electr. & Magn. II. 208 This is the electromotive force which must be supplied from sources independent of magneto-electric induction.

b. Magneto-electric current. Used by Faraday to distinguish currents generated mechanically by magneto-electric induction from those generated in a voltaic battery.

1851 FARADAY in Phil. Trans. CXLII. (1852) 137 On the employment of the Induced Magneto-electric Current as a test and measure of Magnetic Forces.

c. Magneto-electric machine. First used by Faraday, in 1831, to denote a machine generating currents by magneto-electric induction. By later writers employed in variously limited senses.

The appellation continued to be used in Faraday's wide sense by various writers down to about 1867, when the improvements of Wilde, Wheatstone, Siemens, Ladd, Varley and others attracted much attention, and the term 'dynamo-electric machine' was introduced by Brooke. This term was defined by Brooke himself to denote in general a machine 'in which dynamic energy is employed to produce an electric current' (Proc. Roy. Soc. XV. 409, footnote); by others, however, it has been applied to signify only such machines as embodied the principle of self-excitation and did not contain any permanent magnets. Those who adopted the latter usage limited the meaning of 'magneto-electric machine'; some including under that term only the machines with permanent magnets of steel, while others included under the name both these and the machines with separately-excited electro-magnets. The present tendency is to confine the term strictly to the machines with permanent steel magnets. Some writers define magneto-electric machines as simply old-fashioned or rudimentary kinds of dynamos; others treat the terms as synonymous. On the other hand some writers treat 'magneto-electric machine' as a generic term, of which dynamo-electric machines form a sub-class.

1831 FARADAY in Phil. Trans. (1832) CXXII. 160 Two rough trials were made with the intention of constructing magneto-electric machines. Ibid. 163 [Under heading Terrestrial Magneto-electric Induction, describes as magneto-electric machines discs of copper caused to revolve, and thereby generate electric currents under the magnetic influence of the earth.] 1866 CROOKES in Q. Jrnl. Sci. XII. 594 Magneto-electric machines, with revolving armatures, in which electro-magnets had been substituted for permanent magnets, had been constructed. 1867 WHEATSTONE in Proc. Roy. Soc. XV. 369 The magneto-electric machines which have been hitherto described are actuated either by a permanent magnet or by an electro-magnet. 1878 Proc. Inst. Civ. Engin. LII. 63 M. Alfred Niaudet remarked that he did not agree with..the distinction between dynamo-electric and magneto-electric machines. In all these instruments mechanical power was converted into electricity by the action of magnetism; consequently all were both magneto-electric and dynamo-electric. 1878 J. N. SHOOLBRED Prrs. State Electric Lighting 6 For the older form, where permanent magnets are employed, the term 'magneto-electric' machine has been retained. 1880 A. SIEMENS in Jrnl. Soc. Telegr. Engin. IX. 93 A constant and permanent magnetic-field is, therefore, of paramount importance, and it can be produced in the way proposed by Mr. Wilde in 1863 for magneto-electric machines by employing a separate machine for exciting the field-magnets of one or more similar machines. 1882 S. P. THOMPSON in Jrnl. Soc. Arts XXXI. 120 The arbitrary distinction between so-called magneto-electric machines and dynamo-electric machines fails when examined carefully. In all these machines a magnet, whether permanently excited, independently excited, or self-excited, is employed to provide a field of magnetic force. And in all of them dynamic power is employed. 1887 W. B. ESSON Magneto- & Dynamo-electric Machines 22 In all the machines yet described, the electric currents were induced by means of steel magnets, or, as in Wilde's machine, by magnets that were magnetised by the current produced in another machine. Such machines are usually called 'magneto-electric' machines, to distinguish them from the 'dynamo-electric' machines. 1889 Chambers's Encycl. IV. 146/2 The term 'dynamo-electric' was at first applied to distinguish those machines which were self-exciting from 'magneto-electric' machines, which had permanent magnets to give the field; but this distinction is no longer maintained. 1891 J. W. URQUHART Dynamo-Constr. 2 A magneto-electric machine—an apparatus in which steel magnets are used to furnish the 'magnetic field'—is not strictly by common consent called a dynamo.
